Why are these children happy?

BECAUSE THEY'RE PART OF THE BIGGEST CAMP DALEVILLE IN 20 YEARS!

Everybody loves the pool! The summer has started and the weather is warm and refreshing. All campers are swimming and having fun! Every camper receives swim instruction and we are proud to see their development as they become improved swimmers.

JCC BUILDING IMPROVEMENTS

Ongoing upgrades to facilities and equipment help us to make the JCC a better experience for our members. Recent projects include:

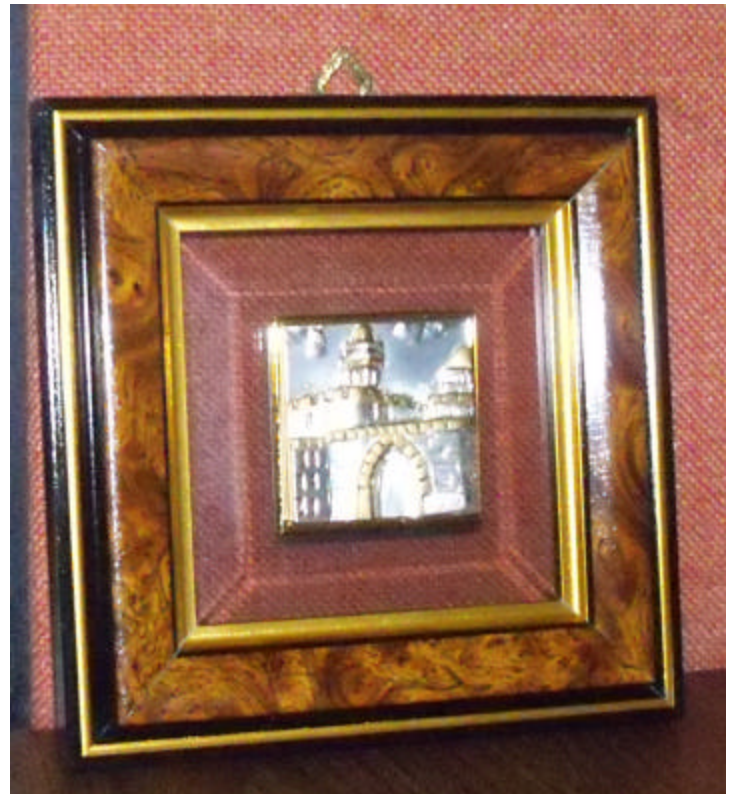

- New mulch for the playground and landscaping in front of the building
- New faucet for the men's bathroom on the main level
- Repair of the flag pole and new flags
- Renovation of the fixtures (sinks, toilets, stalls) in the JCC Camp Daleville locker rooms
- Stripping and cleaning the floors in the auditorium
- Replacement of vinyl signage on the front entrance glass with the new JCC logo
- Installation of a new energy efficient water fountain for the gymnasium

NEW GIFT CASE ITEMS FROM ISRAEL

Our JCC gift case is now offering a beautiful hand-crafted design by the Israeli artist SAAD. Made of sterling silver, this medallion shows a view of Jerusalem mounted on a crystal panel and framed in lovely natural wood accented with gold. An unique feature of this unusual gift is the glass panel, which not only allows the wall to serve as the background of the silver panel but also lets light reflect around it.

We are now stocking two designs of New Years greeting cards (Rosh Hashanah). The smaller design is sold in packages of 6 each and contains the message, "Wishing you all the happiness that a New Year can bring." The larger ones, which are sold individually, say, "This new year greeting holds wishes warm and sincere to bring you, and those you love, happiness throughout the year!"

Both styles of cards and the wall decoration were made in Israel.

The Tenth Song by Naomi Regan

Books available for loan beginning the week of July 11th.

Abigail Samuels has arrived. Her husband has a successful accounting firm, and her daughter, Kayla, a Harvard law student, is engaged to a fellow student. They are pillars of the Orthodox Jewish community in a Boston suburb until their world suddenly falls apart. When a story saying that her husband is funding terrorists appears on the Internet, Abigail's friends vanish. Her daughter runs off to a desert commune in Israel to study with a charismatic Kabbalist, and Abigail rushes to rescue her. While in Israel, both women start to question their previous life paths and begin journeys of self-discovery. Regan's novel mixes current events, Jewish values, a little romance, and a touch of feminism. It will appeal to those interested in contemporary Jewish issues and to fans of women's fiction.

GEFILTE FISH AND THE JEWS

/ Claudia Roden

end, the Messiah will come in the form of a great fish from the sea. The custom of eating fish on the Sabbath is apparently an early one, as the rabbis of the Mishnah (oral law, codified approx. 200 CE) ruled that it was meritorious to eat fish with each of the Sabbath meals; references in the Talmud also indicate that it was customary among Jews to eat fish on Friday night.

In the Ashkenazi kitchen

East European Jews acquired a liking for freshwater fish from the hundreds of rivers which crossed the mainly landlocked areas they inhabited. In the shtetl, fish was brought live on Thursday. It was swimming in tubs at the market and was kept swimming in the bath till Friday, with several changes of water to get rid of the muddy taste; on Friday morning it was killed with a knife or a hammer blow.

Carp, pike, perch, sterlet and trout were all grand fish. Édouard de Pomiane, the French gastronome of Polish origin who wrote about the cooking of the Jews of Poland, remarked that "every observant Jew eats river fish. The wealthy buy carp and pike. The poor content themselves with a miserable roach or sometimes a piece of salt herring." (The poor also ate tench and chub.) Jewish traders on the silk route were involved in introducing carp from China to Central and Eastern Europe in the seventeenth century, and it was Jews who first farmed carp in Poland. They managed fish ponds and also bred fish from the Black, Azov, and Caspian Seas and from the river Don. It was the carp, which traveled easily live in tanks, that they adopted as their fish. Whereas carp became a symbol of the Sabbath, salt herring, which Jewish merchants also traded and which was a lot cheaper than fresh fish, was the symbol of the weekday and marked the contrast between the two.

Many of the old recipes for freshwater fish and herring are now used for saltwater fish like halibut, haddock, cod, plaice, sole, hake, flounder, and salmon. Salmon has become the great Jewish party dish, ever-present at weddings and bar mitzvahs. At my local fishmonger, Corney's, which specializes in salmon, both wild and farmed, there are always long queues of people waiting to have theirs filleted or cut into steaks for the Sabbath.

Gefilte fish

Gefilte means "stuffed" in Yiddish. Originally, a fish forcemeat made from chopped freshwater fish was used to stuff pike or carp skin, which had been pulled off from head to tail down from the neck. Nowadays, gefilte fish generally means the forcemeat alone, made into balls and poached in fish stock. In Britain, the traditional carp and pike have been replaced by a mixture of saltwater fish.

Gefilte fish evolved as a Sabbath dish because stuffing gives it glamor and because certain versions eliminate the need to remove bones (which could be considered a forbidden activity on the Sabbath). There are mentions of Jewish housewives chopping fish and stuffing fish in Germany in the early Middle Ages; the fish they used then was pike. Carp, on the other hand, was adopted in Poland, Lithuania and the Ukraine. In Poland it was markedly sweet, while in Lithuania it was peppery. Today Jews of Russian and Lithuanian background prefer their fish unsweetened, and those of Polish ancestry still like it sweet. The sweet commercial version called "Old Vienna" is so named in reference to the large number of Jews who immigrated to that city from Poland in the nineteenth century.
